I was eagerly waiting to read this not knowing anything more than it was a book about Bruegel. I vaguely recall an art teacher showing our 8th grade class (probably Hunters in the Snow) and being bored stiff. That all turned around in old age in having the opportunity of seeing several of his works in person throughout Europe with those in the Prado and Kunsthistorisches Museum being the standouts. You can keep your renaissance Italians and 18th century French painters the most interesting part

I was eagerly waiting to read this not knowing anything more than it was a book about Bruegel. I vaguely recall an art teacher showing our 8th grade class (probably "Hunters in the Snow") and being bored stiff. That all turned around in old age in having the opportunity of seeing several of his works in person throughout Europe with those in the Prado and Kunsthistorisches Museum being the standouts. You can keep your renaissance Italians and 18th century French painters "the most interesting part of the museums to me are walking into the Flemish masters and beyond Bosch, Bruegel is always the standout.

Mileage out of the book itself will likely hinge on one's appreciation (or disinterest) in the author's personal musings, as he weaves both his tale of grappling with his relationship to his father (which likely in some metaphysical sense ties in with his views on Bruegel's art), the story his journey to most of the locations often with his brother in tow to where the art resides. The reflections on the art itself are worthwhile, the road trip portions are sometimes interesting, but as the story strays into very personal territory my interest waned at times. Having said that, I am glad that the author created this work and it has provided inspiration for future trips and Bruegel sightings.
